Bar Harbor, Maine Getting' Way Down East

First, let's deal with the seemingly oxymoronic term "down east." We say "seemingly" because while it's undeniably the furthest eastern point in the United States it is also quite far north, which doesn't equate to "down" in most of our minds (unless you're Australian). However for those pre-steam-engine sailing ships traveling from Boston to Maine, the trip was downwind. The trip home was therefore up south, but that term never caught on. Or, maybe it has something to do with people from South Boston being called "Southies." It's wicked confusing!

At any rate the down east accent, which you'll be delighted by should you encounter any native Mainers (or Mainahs) during your visit to Bah Habah, has been at the root of Maine regional humor since the "Bert and I" records (round black discs played on a phonograph) of the 50s and 60s. Typical of their stories was one featuring a lost visitor from away driving a spohty cah up and down the road in front of a Mainahs front poahch. Finally he stops to ask directions. "Say mistah, which way t' East Millinawcit?" After several attempts to explain the route, the Mainah replies, "Come t' think of it, y' can't get theyah from heyah."

"Don't ever ask directions of a Maine native, I was told."

"Why ever not?"

"Somehow we think it is funny to misdirect people and we don't smile when we do it, but we laugh inwardly. It is our nature."

— John Steinbeck, "Travels With Charley."

Capital Of Down East

Today, Bar Harbor is home to about 5,200 people and, being the quintessential down east village that happens to have a deepwater port, most of them are in the tourism business. And with as many as three million visitors a year, they're a pretty busy bunch.

Most of those visitors come to eat lobster. Well, not really, but they should and if you have a chance, take it. Mainers say you should never eat a lobster weighing over 1.5 pounds. More than that, too tough. Kind of like the difference between lamb and mutton.

Bar Harbor is located on Mt. Desert Island. Odd name, that. But, supposedly, Samuel Champlain declared this speck of land "L'île des Monts Déserts." The French explorer had spotted Cadillac Mountain and remarked about its barren peak. Maybe he just made a typo and was really comparing it to a dessert. Never mind, he was famous enough to get a big lake named after himself.

The island measures 108 square miles and is remarkably lush despite Champlain's decree. The Jesuits were the first to set up camp on the island. Within one short month, the British destroyed it. For the next one and one half centuries, the French and the British fought over control of the island. Antoine de la Mothe Cadillac, a French fellow, was given the island in the 17th century by Canada. He spent just one summer here before traveling west to create the city of Detroit. (See the connection to the car?)

The British Came

English colonists arrived by the score and controlled Mt. Desert Island until the 1783 Treaty of Versailles established the border between Canada and the U.S. by acknowledging the 13 colonies' independence from Britain.

In the 19th century, Bar Harbor was the summer playground for many of America's most powerful families — the Fords, the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts — all of whom had homes on Millionaires Row to rival the summer "cottages" of Newport, Rhode Island. Sadly, many of the estates were burned down in 1947. Nearby Acadia National Park covers almost 35,000 acres and nearly one-third of this land was the generous gift of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., who also created the 50 miles of carriage paths built so everyone had access to the wilderness.

A Bit Of Maine History

The Vikings. They were really far from home when they found themselves sailing along the coastline of North America some 500 years before any other navigator from Europe arrived. At least this is what the legend says. And scientists confirm that the celebrated Norsemen did carve out primitive settlements in parts of Canada. Some believe they even came ashore in Maine, as well, during the 11th century. But what is known is that John Cabot, the British explorer who sailed from Britain in 1497 under orders of Henry VII to discover a route to the rich Far East, did ply these waters. He was searching for the Northwest Passage, to be exact. Instead, he found Maine. Nonetheless, because of his discovery the British laid claim to North America so, all in all, Cabot was pretty happy.

Following the 1820 Missouri Compromise, the proud state of Maine joined the union as its 23rd state. And something called the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, signed in 1842, demarcated Maine's official border with Canada's New Brunswick.

A delightful little town awaits you, as does a fine selection of activities that highlight Bar Harbor's natural attractions.
